The origins of a special success

Read the article that won its author, Clive Cookson of the Financial Times, a Best Cancer Reporter Award for the clear insight it gives into how cancers behave, and why new approaches to treatment hold great promise despite the relatively poor results most have shown so far.

What do you think?

- Are articles like this one helpful to patients and families who want to play an informed role in decisions about their treatment and care?
- Does good reporting of cancer get the recognition it deserves in your country?
