In the age of austerity, economic drivers are likely to play a determining role in the way health services are structured and organised. In this editorial, urology surgeon Nicola Nicolai argues that, to have an impact on developments, the cancer community needs to move beyond the two dimensional pro- and anti-centralisation debate, and he proposes key criteria for sustainable services that provide each patient with access to the level of specialist services that they need.

What do you think?

- Can the cancer community reach a consensus on key criteria for the way services are organised that are valid for every health system?
- If so, are these the right criteria?
