

Most oncology professionals don't want to play God. But how can you help patients truly share in decisions about their own care if every option carries a level of uncertainty and they feel overwhelmed or unwilling to accept the stark choices on offer? In the Patient Voice, international experts give their advice.

What do you think?

- Do you find it hard to engage patients in reaching decisions about their own care?
- Do you feel you have had enough training and advice on this aspect of your job?
- Have you any tips for others?
- If you are a patient, have you any tips for the doctors?
